Kingsley wrote "Westward Ho" to the booming of gons in the Crimes. The country was ablaze with excitament at the news which came-the storming of the heights of Alma and the charge of the Light brigade. Kingsley longed to be at the war. "This war," he said, "would have made me half mad if I had let it. It seemed so dreadful to hear of those Alma heights knows best, and I suppose I am not fit for such brave work. "But I can fight with my pen still (I don't mean in controversy; I am sick of that), but in writing books which make others fight. This one is to be called 'Westward Ho.'"

"Westward He" was written in 1854, when Kingsley was thirty-five. He had broken down and gone to Devonthe waters which witnessed "the terrible and glorious pageant" of "the bright days of July, 1588, when the Spanish armada ventured slowly past Berry bead, with Elizabeth's gallant pack of Devon captains following fast in its wake, dashing into the midst of the vast lipe, undismayed by size and
